Social media has become a major part of teenagers' daily lives, shaping the way they interact, learn, and view the world. Many young people use platforms like Instagram, TikTok, and Facebook to communicate with friends, share creative ideas, and express their personal opinions. While social media can be entertaining and educational—offering videos, articles, and online courses, it also has serious disadvantages. Spending too much time online may distract students from their studies, affecting their academic performance and reduce meaningful face-to-face communication with family and peers. In addition, constantly comparing their lives to the highlight reels of others can lead to pressure, anxiety, and lower self-confidence among young users. However, when used wisely, social media can be a valuable tool for growth and learning. It allows students to access useful educational content, stay updated with global news, and connect with people from diverse cultures and backgrounds. To ensure a balanced experience, parents and teachers should guide teenagers to use social media responsibly. By setting healthy limits and encouraging mindful usage, young people can enjoy the benefits of connectivity without harming their emotional and mental well-being.
